

10 Typical Article Marketing Do's and Don'ts For Advertising Your Company or Internet Site

By: Scott Lindsay

Article marketing is not really rocket science. If you like writing and love putting words with each other and are aware of the principles of spelling and sentence structure usage, then you might be a whole lot closer to becoming excellent at this type of promoting. There are of course things to avoid otherwise known as "don'ts" as well as things you want to focus on with marketing with articles, otherwise known as "do's"

As a result of browsing some other articles as well as your past ones, you might discover a large amount of the don'ts and do's that are essential to your internet marketing success. The more knowledgeable you grow to be with marketing, of course the more you'll learn of exactly what to avoid and what to do.

Let's start with a number of "don'ts"

- * You should never begin your rough draft with the phrase "The following article is about gardening," (or whatever it happens to be). Always begin by using a thought-provoking problem or bold statement. The concept would be to draw your audience in and make them want to understand more about what you have published.
- * Never make your article too long. Shorter ones tend to be more powerful with fewer chances of your reader becoming lost in your article.
- * You should not turn your written article into a big product sales message. Steer clear of this process, it won't improve your results. Your readers are searching for true information or, precisely what could this do for me personally? They are not looking for hyped-upped ad copy.
- * You should never overly cram keywords and phrases into the articles. The various search engines aren't keen on it.
- * Don't confuse your readers by starting off a sentence and never answering it or not identifying the resolution in the article.

And now for the do's

- * Discuss ideas that you're experienced in or you have expertise in. When you possess experience with a certain subject, it always shows in your writing
- * Do proofread your article, and then proofread it once again checking for spelling and grammar errors before posting it on the internet.
- * You should always include a professional bio box with your article. Attempt to help make the reader interested in what else you provide.
- * Regularly write articles and submit them to directories and websites. You should not stop at just submitting to a tiny handful. It's going to take many submissions for you to benefit from it.
- * Pay attention to your article statistics. Which ones are getting you the most traffic. You should promote or showcase those specific articles somehow.

There you have it, some simple do's and don'ts of article marketing. If you don't work marketing the proper way, then you're wasting your time. You can write the best pieces in the world, however, if they're not represented correctly, or you don't follow the basic tips above, you are also wasting their time. Why not do it the proper way to begin with?
